Ovechkin is on pace for a career high 121 points and after a brief stay at number two has re-established himself as the best player in fantasy hockey. Semin and Backstrom have drafted their way to the top 12 of this list. The two combined for only 6 points in the 5 games he missed in early November.

Note to Steve Yzerman. Martin Brodeur is not the best goaltender in Canada. The gold medal is not won on previous accomplishments. Brodeur is approaching 38 years old, and although he is still producing big numbers in team based categories, his SV% is once again mediocre. Facing the 3rd least shots in the NHL he has a .915 SV%, good for 16th among NHL starters. Giant Elephant in the room, Scott Clemmensen's career regression.

At one point, it looked like Bobby Ryan was a bust at number two behind Crosby, but if you were to redraft today he may still be drafted at number two. 2005 was a fairly deep draft, as good as the Hawks are right now, it makes you wonder where they would be if they hadn't drafted Skille at 7.

Based on performance to date + potential shown I would have to go with a top 10 of:
1. Crosby 2. Kopitar 3. Price 4. Ryan 5. Stastny
6. Rask 7. Neal 8. Letang 9. Staal 10. Vlasic

I recently read Hockeynomics and they had a stat called goals created. The reasoning being a goal is more important than an assist, therefore should be weighted as such. My question. During 2006, are we to assume that Jonathan Cheechoo was the more valuable player because 56 goals are more important than Thornton's 72 assists? I guess it is just a coincidence that Brett Hull's three highest goal totals just happened to coincide with Adam Oates three year tenure with the Blues and that Neely's 50 goals in 49 games came with Oates as his center. I am calling bullshit on that stat.
